

COMMENTS ON THE MOVIE EARTHBOUND

Thank, the Producers for Promoting the Kenyan Documentary, "Earthbound".

The production team did a good job and should explore exposing the movie to a broader audience. We highly recommend it for students, environmental advocates and the general audiences as well.

Earth Bound is a well-produced movie that is not only powerful but interesting and informative bringing in a fresh perspective on plastic recycling. Though set in Kenya, the story of Nzambi offers a relatable perspective on identity and belonging.

The use of compelling images brings out the reality of the enormous heap waste in Nairobi, the challenges and the opportunities that it presents. However, in the same light, we appreciate the producer's efforts to juxtaposition the beauty of the Kenya wildlife scenery, presenting Kenya as great tourist destination.

Nzambi is a captivating storyteller and keeps you glued right to the end. The support by her mother and sisters is admirable.

The documentary has captured factual information about the situation with plastic disposal and has further given an awareness of overcoming the plastic waste problem in a constructive way, for the good of all.

The Movie was a capitating example of innovation and how we can make use of and turn the waste disposals on our environment into valuable and affordable products for use in different aspects of our daily life. It changes our negative view on waste disposals to the fact that what we disregard as waste, can be turned into valuable raw materials for making simple and useful end products. This serves as a useful way of getting rid of our waste disposal from our environment for purpose of prevention of pollution and environmental degradation.
